10: d'Orleans--268 T-3 (1891-92) 1894 Laos
116, 166, 651, 177.65 Siam
636.65

"Fishing is one of the principal resources of the inhabitants of the valley of Nam Ou; they are forced to turn everything into money, for they are crushed by the taxes imposed upon them by Siam. The village, on the right bank, in which we spend the night, is inhabited by some people from Traniuh, who tell us that they left their homes three years ago on account of the cholera, they came to Luang Prabang in five nights, and from there they have come up here; but they do not appear to have gained any advantage from their change of place; they have fled from the frying-pan into the fire, for their new conquerors make each man pay eight rupees a year poll tax; they can remember a time before these heavy burdens were laid upon them, but now they can never satisfy the revenue collectors. A great many of them are forced to sell all their possessions."

China Geographical Service /Service géographique de l'Indochine/ and the road surveys made by administrators at the heads of provinces nevertheless agree substantially in estimating the area of Laos at approximately 250,000 square kilometers, or about half that of France. 131 654

Population. This is the largest of the five countries in French Indo-China, and it is also the least densely populated. According to information collected on the spot, the population must be between a million and 1,200,000 inhabitants, a figure appreciably larger than the one figuring in the official documents, which estimate it to be only 800,000. Persons of the Laotian race in the strict /3/ sense form the majority. They populate the plains which are watered by the Mékong and its tributaries and the low altitude plateaus. The mountains are inhabited by highly diverse races belonging to various ethnic types, some of which are related to the Chinese, and others to the Tibetan branch, while still others are grouped under the generic name of "Khas." These various groups are scattered over the western side of the Annamitic Chain, the foothills of the plateau of Trân-Ninh and in the upper valley of the Mékong. 161 /162/ 162

The extremely low population density is to be explained by the Siamese and Chinese invasions in the course of the nineteenth century. The "Hos," plunderers who came from Yunnan, massacred the inhabitants after they had burned their villages and forced those who escaped famine or torture to settle in another region. The Siamese proceeded in a more methodical manner and depopulated the country by transporting inhabitants, livestock and elephants to the right bank of the Mekong and oftentimes taking them as far as the valley of the Ménam. 162 166 648* 175

Upper Laos. Upper Laos, a ramification of the Tibetan plateau, "is an inextricable tangle /4/ of wild and wooded mountains in the midst of which paths wind like gigantic Russian mountains" (1). The country has a savage look. These high 133 133 137

1. Dr. Lefèvre, "Le Haut-Laos" (Bulletin de la Société de Géographie commerciale, 1898).

mountain chains, which are cut here and there by deep valleys where torrents which are often invisible flow, are covered with